I think having the name of a good dictionary maker is going to be just as important."Oxford University Press (OUP) publishes both the Oxford Dictionary of English, which documents the current usage of English words and is used by Countdown, and the Oxford English Dictionary (OED), a historical dictionary and one of the largest in the world. The OED is the preferred dictionary for a number of news outlets, including the BBC. It illustrates word definitions by quoting from more than 100,000 modern and historical texts, from Shakespeare's plays to scripts from TV shows such as Buffy the Vampire Slayer. The first section, A to Ant, was published in 1884 and work on the first OED continued right through World War One. In fact, it has been recorded that staff members took their work with them including soldier George Watson, who corrected proofs by candlelight in the trenches and even in a captured German dugout. It was proposed that the first edition of the OED would be four volumes, with 6,400 pages. But after 70 years in production - a huge 60 years longer than expected - the actual size of the OED was 10 volumes and 15,490 pages in 1928. The second edition was published by Oxford University Press 61 years later in 1989 and was 20 volumes and 21,730 pages. By this time the volumes weighed 137.72lb (62.6kg) in total. An online version was launched in 2000. Image caption, The OED team collects evidence of words being used from documents including newspapers and novels. Now the third edition of the ever increasing dictionary is in production, with an expected publication date some time in the 2030s. It already features 600,000 words, three million quotations, and covers more than 1,000 years of English. "We are not doing anything that would make printing it impossible," said Peter Gilliver, Oxford English Dictionary associate editor. "If there was a market for it, why would Oxford University Press say 'no we won't print it'? But the I know he has to be mediated. There may still be people who want a print version. "Fiona McPherson, senior editor of new words, added: "It would be great. By Emma Harrison. BBC News. Image caption, the first edition of the Oxford English Dictionary was published in 1928. TV Show Countdown has already announced that its "dictionary chant" will use the online version of the Oxford English Dictionary instead of the printed version. Does this spell the end of the dictionary printed in the digital age? One estimate at one point was that if we kept adding and revising words, it would double in size. "The Oxford University press says that the OED was never commercially profitable, but £34m of funding was committed to its review and new word programs. The publisher has 70 internal employees working on the third edition of the OED, who are both reviewing entries and adding new words. For a word to be added, the team has to collect evidence of the word being used in the language of documents, including Newspapers, novels and TV. "You don't want to show a good spread of kinds of places that you would expect to find that kind of word. We can mark a word as obsolete, but there's still a 'that has to be said,' Gilliver said. "Even new words have a 'One word has to prove itself," said McPherson. One Word that took the team by surprise was Omg, which seemed to be a modern word, its earliest known use A.D., in fact, in a letter written in 1917. Ms McPherson said: "You are constantly surprised, they (words) are older than you don't think." It may take about five years for a word to be added - but once it is, it will never be removed. For dictionary, there was an element of sadness in moving on from the show's famous "Pencam" - a small camera that highlights words in the dictionary in "Dictionary Corner". "I remember the last Pencam shot I took and feeling very emotional about it," said the lexicographer. But it's amazing how quickly I got used to looking at the laptop. "I miss Pencam, but I don't miss the dictionary." The caption of the image, Susie Dent was stressed that the principles of the dictionary corner will remain exactly the same. The online version of the Oxford Dictionary, is updated every three months, much more frequently than the printed version, which was last published in 2010. Dent says this will make it fairer to competitors who come up with words that only have been added recently, such as "selfie". And she emphasizes that the principles of the dictionary song will remain exactly the same. "It seems like an important decision and to viewers of the show, it would be because 'Ey are used to me rooting through the printed dictionary," she said. "We thought it would be unfair if a competitor came up with a word that had not made it into the printed dictionary. The caption of the image, the OED illustrates the word definitions, quoting from more than 100,000 modern and historical texts "is to really give competitors the best chance of getting their word allowed. That's what makes the job so rewarding." Countdown viewers will see the change in the dictionary corner on Monday, June 30 on channel 4. The BBC is not responsible for the content of external web sites. "This reflects that English is evolving probably faster than ever before." But does she think the printed dictionary will eventually disappear from use? "Whether or not he will disappear is a tough call, hopefully not personally," she said. "I think it is possible to end up being very .enilnO .enilnO .enilno ralupop
